

Christmas reading in kindergarten

Following the idea of the Lithuanians from last year, when they went to an old people's home, our tenth graders visited a kindergarten in the time before Christmas. The idea was to be together with the children, play with them and read to them from Christmas books the students remembered from their time at the kindergarten. Some of them had been at the same kindergarten they were visiting now.

They children thoroughly enjoyed the time because they like to have as many "grown-ups" as possible around them to play with hem and read to them almost individually. On the photos you see our students in the kindergarten book corner looking for appropriate books. For legal reasons we were not allowed to take photos showing kindergarten kids gathered around them. The activity turned out to be very effective so it is planned to do it again in January and maybe in some of the following month, too, especially in the time before Easter.

The activity was easy to organize and as you can see there are various ways and institutions of how and where to spring into action. The Lithuanians went singing to an old people's home, our students went reading to a kindergarten. Other institutions could be primary schools, pre-schools... It is not really difficult to find volunteers for these activities because students like to go outside school and apply their abilities, especially if it is work with younger children.
